Nearly all of the major weaknesses and unresolved problems of modern complex society can be traced directly to the fact that males are: in charge, create and implement public policy, and promote competitive relations among nations. When humans were challenged by predators, male attributes were essential to human biological survival. When human groups became more populous, competition for resources brought these groups into conflict, and male assertive characteristics were important to assure social survival. But now, the only predators are other humans, and at all scales much greater cooperation is needed. Aggressive males continuing to lead are putting complex society at risk of self annihilation. The time has come for women to take charge of our societies and see if the female perspective can unite humanity to share resources and benefits fairly among nations and to implement a sustainable relationship with the planet's ecology.
