

Love/Unification and Cultural Adjustment to Out-of-Control Change 2026

Thomas A. Burns PhD

Klamath Falls, Oregon

Love is the intense positive experience of connectedness to the point of unification – becoming ONE. We celebrate love as the epitome of all states of being – an ideal. As desirable as the ideal of love may be, in its “pure” form it is not sustainable. Accordingly, love waxes and wanes in association with different life circumstances and their allied states of mind. In fact, we devote most of our lives to activities and thoughts together with their mental states that are far more self-serving and competitive. Love exists at one extreme on the love – hate continuum with the lesser intensities between “like” and “dislike” being more common.

Individually and collectively we humans manage these alternative emotional and cognitive orientations as directed by our cultures. To be sustainable, culture must be able to both respond to a wide variety of circumstances and adjust when prevailing conditions change. In situations of rapid change, adjusting appropriately is challenging for all cultures which thrive on stability. In this regard, human cultures worldwide are currently failing miserably to adjust to the ever accelerating changes at the global scale caused by artificial intelligence, autocracy, climate change, ecological degradation, economic/financial determinism, materialism, religious fundamentalism, genetic engineering, etc. And if we add disclosure of the long-term presence on Earth of humanoid ultraterrestrials [indicating humans are neither alone nor preeminent], this already huge package of challenges requiring cultural adjustment gets inflated significantly. In this overall, virtually unattended change/challenge context, pervasive conflict at the global scale becomes almost inevitable and very dangerous.

Large scale conflict evokes hatred at the cultural and subcultural levels, and antagonism is self-defeating for achieving the adjustments that are necessary at the global level. Without much greater worldwide commitment to the orientation of Love/Unification, the cultures of humanity face the prospect that conflict created by out-of-control change will threaten the very existence of complex society, even result in species extinction.

Slow Down, Unify, and Adjust Globally.
Promoting Much Greater Love and Foresight IS the Answer.